Christmas is for everyone.

I confess that I belong to no one religion yet respect and believe in all of them. Christmas is a special time. All over the world different cultures designate special festival seasons to celebrate life.

Joyful festivities include feasting, dancing, some form of gift exchange and often lights or pyrotechnic display. In essence, it a massive cultural catharsis to celebrate the joy of life.

In North America the chosen time to do this is Christmas, which has its roots both in Christianity and the more ancient religions that celebrated the return of light.

Fall is a sad time and we mourn summers passing as the days shorten, the cold winds blow and the birds fly south.

Imagine if there was no festive season to look forward to and that we had to endure this long period of cold and darkness till the first buds of spring?

I think that if Christmas did not exist, as the days shortened we would become more and more despondent, the darker and colder it became. Then one day someone would notice that it was getting lighter. This would call for a celebration. Neighbors would be invited over and a fat goose sacrificed for the occasion. We would hug each other and talk about summer and the rebirth of the land when birds would sing, flowers bloom, crops grow and animals produce their young. If ever there was a good reason to have a tippie that certainly was it.

And come to think of it why not give our neighbor a goose. After all we have more than we need and since we are relieved that the days are now going to get longer it is a good time to give gifts to show how happy we are.

This is Christmas to me. I string lights around the buildings and on the trees. It compensates for the darker evenings and although it is kitsch it adds wonder to the season and kids of all ages love it. The darkness is not only dispelled but becomes bearable and a time of fun and magic especially if there is a blanket of snow to reflect the lights. If it dispels the gloom of winter and brings joy to some, then it has served its purpose.

Canada is a multicultural society. We all share this winter festival in our own private ways and there should be a bond amongst all people to celebrate whatever their faith demands as well as the rebirth of light and the renewal of the earth.

I believe that all good people will find time for their private beliefs and rejoice in the fact that this is a time for all to love their neighbor, share their wealth, help those who need, be a little reckless, buy a present for their pet and above all, bring joy and peace to all mankind. Something we all dearly wish for.
